Dietary polyphenols have been associated with lowered risk of chronic disease, but mechanisms of action have been elusive due to their poor absorption. Recent work has demonstrated that dietary polyphenols and other plant components may benefit host health indirectly through alteration of the gut microbiota.